Whether it is an installation that may not have gone as planned, or a random problem that comes out anywhere. Here is a list of your stereo problems for common cars, symptoms and solutions to help get your stereo up and run! Problem: You can't find a possible accessory / power supply cable Solution: In some cases, car stereo are not wired with an accessory / 12 V accessory cable, making postmarket radio difficult to install and work properly. Many jeep and chevrolet systems have a data signal wire that carries a very low voltage signal indicating to the main unit of the OEM when turning on, however; It is not compatible with aftermarket units. The simplest way to locate an accessory / ignition cable is to find a cigarette lighter that turns on when the machine does. Put yourself behind the lighter and touch the positive cable and connect it to your red accessory / ignition cable on your aftermarket wiring. Problem: Head Unit has power but no solution as possible: many cars have built amplifiers that require a 12 V signal to be sent to turn on the amplifier, the most common being Bose, Infinity and JBL. If your car has any of these systems, check the AMP signal cable for 12V. Blue / white thread located on the head combined wire wiring. Problem: Installed an aftermarket head and now it has no possible solution: first off, check the wiring. If you have a voltage meter or a test light, try the soil (black), the 12V constant (yellow) and 12V (red) accessory to check if you have the correct voltage in the correct cables, in addition to a good Earth. Constant will always be 12V, regardless of whether your car is turned on or The accessory will be 12 V only when you turn the key in the position "or the machine is running. Make sure to use the ground as well as another ground (such as the frame or the body of the machine) during the test of your constant and accessory to test that you have a If one of your power or ground cables is incorrect, check the electrical schematics of your car and make sure you have the correct power and ground cables.If you're out of power and you know your wiring is correct, check the fuses under the dashboard or under the hood (depending on your car). The easiest way to find the correct fuse is to consult the User Manual and find the fuse number and the location of the box. Your manual should indicate which fuse is for "Accessories", "Stereo Auto", or something like that. After finding the fuse's location, pull it and make sure the wires are not corroded and the fuse has not broken or broken.If your speakers have stopped working accidentally and you have noticed that your amplifier is in protective mode, there are a few reasons why this could have happened.Most aftermarket amplifiers have both low and high voltage protection. If your alternator produces too much power, it will activate the amplifier protection mode. Conversely, if the battery is low and the amplifier does not receive a constant 12v, it will enter protection mode.Also the amplifiers will go into protection mode if there is a short somewhere. If you have an RCA signal cable that is shorting, this might be your problem, so check if your RCA are in-tact and not shorting. Also, if one of the output channels is shorted, or if you have a loudspeaker skipped, many aftermarket amplifiers go into protection mode. Disconnect all output channels and see if it will return to normal operation. Problem: Alternator wine Possible solution: If you hear a wind noise fluctuating with the vehicle's laps and decreasing when the car's engine is turned off, you are dealing with Alternator wine. Alternator Wine is caused by bad soil your header or speaker amplifier. check your ground wires and find a better place to put them on the ground, such as the frame or body of the car. of the car:Lighting the headlights when you have the radio on with amplifiers and post-market subwoofers, your stereo is drawing too much energy for the alternator to keep up. There are some solutions to this problem: wire in a capacitor. Although curing headlights are very low in the list to a condenser is used, a condenser may be the solution to your problem. A capacitor is made to bend peaks in power from the battery to the amplifier, to create a consistent 12v power. Added a capacitor with the correct Farad. in some cases, curves the power drawing of the amplifier high enough to limit the dark lights. The rule of thumb will do the conversion of power is one away from every 1000-watt. Update alternator. Sometimes OEM donut alternators generate enough energy for your updated stereo system. Updating the alternator to one that can produce enough energy to handle your upgraded amplifiers/stereos will solve your taillight. Get a bigger/Better battery: Sometimes old/cheap batteries can be one of the sources in your flash light problem. Replace the battery with a newer, bigger beater to handle more power and charge. Even if that doesn't solve the problem, it might help. Add an auxiliary battery: cable in a completely separate battery to power only your stereo. This will reduce the load on the engine battery and sometimes solve your weak light bulbs. Problem a: Installed a Stereo machine. Now Radio has no possible signal solution: If you have installed a new unit is at the head of your car, and you are now noticing that your car radio has an abnormal amount of static, you may have wired the unit incorrectly. Here's what you should be looking for: pull out the new stereo to get access to the wires again. Look for a blue wire Market's head and make sure it is connected to a corresponding wire inside your vehicle's safety belt. Blue or Blue / White cable on your post market unit is that it feeds a powered antenna. Without the current, the antenna of your vehicle is significantly significantly powerful and will result in static. Problem: Car headlight lights When the music is raised the loudest possible solution: If you have recently installed a stereo with an amplifier and subwoofer, your alternator and battery may not be powerful enough to handle the extra power that is pulled when your stereo is turned at high volumes. Check the battery a ~ is the battery fresh? Have one of your local auto stores like O'Reilly Auto Parts performs a load test on it. The battery might be on its way out.appears the output of your alternator with the power needs of the stereo or the components you've added to your car. An upgraded alternator may be required.Cast a capacitor a ~ Capacitors Keep the battery to bend the peaks of power demand on the battery and on the alternator. This can help tremendously but requires you to purchase and wire into an add-on to your system. Don't you see your problem on this list?
