Dear Ms. Miller:

Thank you for immediately calling me regarding my application. I am really pleased to get an offer from your end to be a senior writer, instead of a junior writer which I applied for.

However, I would like to make a few clarifications first before formally accepting your offer. I would like to know if you are still interested to hire me since my contract with me previous employer would end next month (Date:). I would like to make this clear first before signing any document from your company.

Despite my existing contract, however, I am very interested to work as one of your senior writers. I believe your company could give me great opportunities once I join you.

Thank you and I hope to hear from you soon.

Regards,

Nina White

One such favor is writing a proof of employment letter. Being an employer, you can understand how it feels to read lengthy nonsense letters. Don't forget to give your contact details in the letter, so that the recipient may confirm that you really exist and the letter wasn't a sharpened letter. In case you give him the undue favor, this may cause problems for the new employer. Since people are more interested to know that the person was actually employed by you, you should take a little length verifying the employment by specifying the year and month during which he has been working for you. It is necessary to include information on the case; the recipient of your letter has any follow-up questions or concerns that need to be cleared. Proof of employment letters is verification letters that are written by ex-employers for their employee as proof that they have been employed at their workplace. Sending out an employment letter can be dicey especially for a new organization. He has a good reputation among all staff members and is very hard working and loyal gentleman.
